In a brilliant piece titled, "Inside the DementiaMine," The New Yorker reported on the depressing culture of competitive, ruthless and toxic dementia treatment. I think all of us have a troubled relationship with the things that can go wrong with our bodies. A broken bone, an illness, a traumatic event. But for people with cognitive impairment, these things can happen over and over again. The brain isn't made up of cells so it can be damaged or replaced. Once it's gone, it's gone forever. Treatment can be challenging -- but by no means impossible. I've worked in a geriatric psychiatry hospital and also a behavioral neurology hospital to give me a feel for how things work at the bedside level, but despite their challenges, many of these hospitals possess a rich ecology of caring humans who experience joy and sorrow in equal measures. The real problem is that most people aren't trained to care for those with dementia. Until very recently, the education of the professions on dementia and how to care for those with the disease was pitiful. Until this summer, New York State only had two behavioral neurology programs, one of which was for psychiatric residents, but they have since been combined. If you want to experience some interesting, personal and emotional challenges in the world of dementia, do what I do and get involved in some of the day-to-day care and education around dealing with this disease. It will be eye opening and humbling. It will also leave you devastated, angry and hurt. But it's the only way to truly understand what it is like to live in the shadow of this illness. The arena of dementia care is small, but it is growing and getting more attention. Blogs and websites can help us share the burden of caring for people with dementia and their caregivers. We can reduce stigma and assist in breaking down the coldness of policies and applications that place responsibility on families, and recognize that the best treatment is one that gives patients as much control over their lives as possible. There is a special place in hell for anyone who chooses not to help a dementia patient, or any patient with any type of illness. United States Court of Appeals FOR THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT

[The clinical observation of screw placement using conventional and digital methods: a comparative study]. To investigate whether screw placement would be simplified and safely achieved when new positioning method of cephalic index of mandible axis and position of midpoint of mandibular canal is applied in combination. A comparative study was carried out in two groups: group A (conventional) and group B (digital). Significantly fewer screw entry points and almost no deviation from the planned position were achieved in group B (P<0.05). This invention relates to a method of smoothing a laser material processed with a beam, more particularly to a method of smoothing a heat-affected zone of a laser material processed with a beam. In manufacturing a semiconductor device by a submicron process, a photoresist is required to have a high precision by which an optical resolution of a photosensitive device must be accomplished. Therefore, in general, a surface of the photoresist must be entirely processed to smooth the surface. There are known several methods of smoothing the surface of the photoresist. A typical method is one in which the photoresist is subjected to a heat treatment at a temperature of 120.degree. C. for 5 seconds so as to smooth the surface of the photoresist. This technique is generally called annealing. However, there is found a problem that, because of the large heat treatment temperature, it is difficult to fully remove projections produced on the surface of the photoresist by a reactive ion etching (RIE) method, or the like. If the projections are left intact, troubles such as separation of the photoresist from a substrate, or the like may occur. In addition to this, there may occur a problem that the heat treatment cannot be applied to a heat-resistant substrate in the final product. There is another known technique in which a photo-resist is processed with a beam of energy of 0.1 mJ or less, and then cooled to room temperature, thereby smoothing the surface of the photoresist
