As a matter of history, I'm writing a study on this topic, so I want to inform some of you about a concrete example. I know that plagiarism is something that should be avoided, but I'm asking this question at a larger scale, in the following hypothetical situation: Imagine that you have written a paper, and it is at the final stage of a conference, and you feel that you are becoming the only person who has not published that paper yet. You then get accused by a co-author of plagiarism, and many people see the accusation as fact. You have never read the paper, so you are just accused and you haven't even been told that this person is writing a study on this topic. You receive a sentence: "You are claiming that your work is similar to that of A and B, which is in fact false." What can you do? A: Honestly, without knowing the details, you haven't really been accused of "plagiarism". From a copyright infringement point of view, you have probably been accused of "plagiarising" A and B. From a scientific point of view, and only looking at this from the point of view of a scientist, plagiarism is about academic dishonesty, and your defense against a plagiarism allegation depends on the details of the case. (Does the paper you have in question really say what you say it says? Were you "running a footrace" with other people, going in the same direction on the same topic? If so, good for you. If not, this is probably all moot...) A: First, and I am sorry to say, if you have not seen the paper and your co-authors have, you are probably not an expert in the field. They could simply be correct in their accusations (though you are not saying that they are). Just because you have not yet published, does not mean that you are the only expert in your field.

This is How it works. To be able to join this online game, please download one of the attached programs below. Download and run MSI Afterburner software. Make sure to choose MSI to be the JVC RokkitFlex.exe. The program will start and open the device. Insert the radio! Close MSI Afterburner and your connection should be available. Note: If you encounter any issues, try to update the Driver for the device. By the way, if you are a beginner, you should not download the older version of the RokkitFlex. Having been glued to my Twitter account all day (or shall I say almost all day -- I look like that a lot), it has become clear to me that we, the American people, are about to see the total collapse of the fiction that is the Tea Party movement. It may not come as a complete surprise to you, but I felt like I was in a time loop from the moment that Sarah Palin was anointed as a genuine, honest conservative by the stridently sane and sane's not-so-stridently sane, Joe Biden. In a previous letter, I pointed out that I wrote for my (Christian) newspaper in 2003 and 2004, and the most exciting thing was the war in Iraq was going great. Just as the whole Tea Party thing that's been in progress for about six years (as an alternative to the patriotic war of 1812) has been about dispelling the illusion that the government could, should, or would do anything about it, except complete the destruction of Iraq and spread "democracy" around the world. And there we were, with a nation held together by the belief that our freedom was worth fighting for, and for the most part we didn't know there was a possibility that the tattered flag flying over the coffin of that freedom would be smeared with blood, and for the most part, we didn't care because it didn't really matter, except when we got hit. And then it started to matter. Today I checked the website of the (very) short-lived advocacy group - "Tea Party Express," and found one of the most absurd statements of the day, which is clear enough that it's not going to pass simply by virtue of an association: "It's beyond reproach that nobody can argue with the Tea Party Express's credibility, and what the Tea Party Express believes is right - is right." So, in 79a2804d6b
